THREE KEYS TO EFFECTIVELY ADDRESSING THE UNAUTHORIZED RESELLER MARKET

AGMA Offers Advice and Helpful Tips to Manufacturers to Avoid Losses of Revenue and Positive Brand Recognition
Through Unauthorized Reseller Products

FREMONT, Calif., April 8, 2008 – Most companies today are aware of the damaging effects of unauthorized vendors and resellers on branded products. However, many have been unable to develop and implement effective programs in response.

The unauthorized resale of new, genuine goods and products outside of authorized distribution channels without the consent or knowledge of the manufacturer is a practice that poses risks to customers and can tarnish the reputation and value of quality brand names. A recent research study by KPMG indicates that the unauthorized market costs the IT industry up to $5 billion annually and negatively impacts customers who unknowingly purchase unauthorized products.

The Alliance for Gray Market and Counterfeit Abatement (AGMA), a non-profit organization dedicated to addressing issues relating to the unauthorized channel resale and counterfeiting of technology products around the globe, believes that these problems pose a serious threat to the global economy and the free market. The organization also believes that manufacturers that address unauthorized reseller and channel issues can help to protect consumers from receiving poor quality unauthorized market goods, as well as help secure brand integrity of their products.

Aiming to assist technology manufacturers in tackling unauthorized market issues, AGMA has developed Three Keys to Effectively Addressing the Unauthorized Reseller Market:

- Corporate awareness;
- Review of entities in the company's distribution channels;
- Effective serial number tracking.

The first key is to build corporate awareness. It is important to educate all employees to recognize the unauthorized market issue and develop strategies in response. Following are a few tips on building corporate awareness of this issue:

- Understand the scope of the issue and its root causes by mapping how products go to market and review channel distribution structures, partner contracts, and reseller programs;
- Train employees, especially those in customer services, sales, product marketing and management, to recognize the signs indicating unauthorized reselling may be occurring;
- Create compliance guidelines that detail a code of conduct, red flags, escalation process, internal and external deterrents, and important contact information.

The second key relates to strategies for reviewing applicants seeking to enter the company's distribution channels. Manufacturers should review individual companies prior to authorization as a reseller or distributor. Following are tips for reviewing resellers and distributors:

- Verify corporate status and business license;
- Check for subsidiaries and understand their business relationships to the parent (i.e. procurement, logistics, etc.);
- Check for other entities associated with principals;
- Locate UCC filings;
- Conduct a civil litigation check;
- Inspect the Restricted Parties List (Government RPL);
- Check against known terrorist organizations and governmental de-barred lists;

- Verify criminal history of company and its principals;
- Perform physical address verifications to confirm the business legitimacy of the applicant.

The third key is to develop an effective serial number tracking program. Implement a serial number tracking program that increases visibility of the flow of products throughout the distribution channel – from the manufacturer to the end user. Following are essential tips for establishing best practice guidelines for product tracking:

- Understand how the product flows through the entire distribution channel;
- Develop best practices including product returns and replacements, discount and warranty claims, and any other logistical scenarios;
- Conduct interviews and audits of distributors or resellers to address compliance with contractual and program terms and conditions;
- Summarize the output and findings of the compliance audit in a final report together with recommendations for improvement;
- Keep accurate records for serial number verification.

By implementing AGMA's Three Keys to Effectively Addressing the Unauthorized Reseller Market, along with its tips and recommendations, IT companies can build a best practice process that provides valuable benefits to all partners involved, as well as consumers and the IT industry as a whole.
